ASK DR. G

Question: I just read that in addition to chocolate, dogs should not eat raisins or grapes? Is this true? What other foods are on the "off-list"?

Answer: There have been few reports of grapes and raisins causing acute nephrotoxicity (damages the kidney). ASPCA poison control center considers grapes and raisins to be toxic; however, there has never been a controlled study verifying these claims. In general, it is believed that the toxicity is not due to the pesticide on grapes. I have several clients who have been giving grapes to their dogs for a long time without any known adverse effect. But, to be safe, I recommend staying away from grapes and raisins.

Other common foods like onion and garlic have been implicated in causing red blood cell damage. The study on garlic published in the Journal of American Veterinary Medical Association is rather faulty in my opinion. I do not see any harm in giving dogs a small amount of garlic with home cooked food. However, it really does not work to keep fleas down. Some insurance companies tell pet owners to avoid avocado. I am unaware of any scientific studies evaluating avocado use and dogs. However, if you have pet insurance by one of these companies, it would be good to avoid avocado. I do not have pet insurance and both my puppies get avocado every evening with their salad. Be sure to discuss this topic with your veterinarian and get his or her advice on feeding your dog.
